New state plans reveal that China is looking to curb solar and wind energy use and is aiming to cut the total output of electricity from all sources to 10 percent of its total output by 2020. The new plans, put forward by the country's State Council, follow on from a decree in August 2009 that called for an 80 percent cut in the production of solar panels by 2015. The government is going for a 20 percent reduction over the following four years, which would mean that by 2020 there will be only just over 15 gigawatts of solar installed in the country. The government wants to replace all other forms of power generation with solar energy, with wind power excluded from the demand and solar power included. The plans are backed by huge subsidies for solar and wind power, which provides a major incentive to keep up production of both solar and wind power. The government recently announced that the much vaunted "solar-decree" has been shelved, with a plan to just speed up the completion of the hundreds of solar parks planned for the next five years.The K-
