The purpose of this study was to examine the effect of the physical environment on the systematic use of physical restraints and antipsychotic medications for restraint-eligible long-term care residents in long-term care facilities (LTCFs). This was a longitudinal study of residents eligible for restraint. Data were gathered from both residents' medical records and direct patient observation. The physical environment was hypothesized to influence the systematic use of both medications. Three hypotheses related to the use of restraints were tested. Antipsychotic use for N = 969 residents was examined. Sample consisted of 527 residents from one LTCF. Antipsychotic use was a significant proportion of the total medications used (N = 4969). Long-term care facility residents who were restrained were treated with antipsychotic medications significantly more frequently than those without restraint (59.2% vs 29.6%). Caregivers reported that residents' agitation increased before restraint. However, the findings suggest that that the physical environment itself influenced residents' use of antipsychotic medication independent of the reported agitation. Contrary to the current standard of practice, the results of the study suggest that restraint-eligible residents are treated with Optimization of culture conditions for recombinant Aspergillus niger production of recombinant human growth hormone. The production of heterologous recombinant proteins in filamentous fungi has become a popular alternative to recombinant protein expression in Escherichia coli as a result of the characteristics of these organisms, such as their ability to secrete large amounts of extracellular proteins, the availability of sophisticated genetic tools to manipulate their genomes and the high levels of secreted recombinant protein achievable in fermentation systems. This study describes the optimization of culture conditions for the production of recombinant human growth hormone (rhGH) in Aspergillus niger by using fermentation parameters and medium supplements, such as copper, selenite,

Adverse drug reactions (ADRs) can present problems for patients, doctors, pharmacists, and nurses, as well as health care insurers. The associated adverse impact on patients can be considerable in terms of morbidity, disability, chronic disease, and mortality. Many ADRs lead to patient harm that can be prevented. Many more ADRs are not identified by any of the above staff groups. A regional toxicology service has been organised as a service to detect ADRs early. It is able to review case histories to identify ADRs in a timely manner. Following the identification of ADRs, appropriate interventions can be introduced to reduce the risk to the patient. These interventions include consideration of counter-measures to the drug, a change of drug administration or a
