Osteosarcoma of the skull is rare, and there are only a few large series in the literature. Most studies are case reports. With improved diagnosis and treatment, the disease may be cured, and the patient may be cured at first diagnosis. We describe our experience with patients with this rare neoplasm, and review the world literature on this topic. We retrospectively reviewed the charts of patients with cranial osteosarcoma treated at our institution from 1993 to 2003. The histologic criteria for diagnosis were reviewed. There were 10 patients treated for this disease. Six patients were treated with complete resection and chemotherapy. The mean age at diagnosis was 17.2 years, and there were seven males and three females. The histologic diagnosis was osteoblastic in six, chondroblastic in three, and fibroblastic in one. There was no recurrence in the follow-up period. There is no apparent survival advantage in patients with cranial osteosarcoma treated with aggressive local therapy. The standard of care is total resection and multiagent chemotherapy. What is Foundation Engineering?
