I have an image in the form of a noise texture. I want to create an image that is based on the same noise texture. The difference is I want the image to look like a tile texture (whose columns are aligned in a row). The rows (and columns) of the image that I want to create will use the same frequency, albeit a few differences in the amplitudes of frequencies (see image below). In other words, the frequency is the same but the amplitudes differ slightly. Here is a mock up I made, showing the desired result. Any idea on how I can do that? A: You can do this with a few steps: Create your noise texture. Create a grayscale texture that averages the values of your noise texture across columns. Use DistanceToBorder and blur to smooth out the grayscale texture without creating aliasing. To take a noise texture and make it look like a grayscale map, create a grayscale texture using a straightforward average of the input noise image. To do this, create a pixel shader that looks like this: fixed4 frag(v2f IN) { fixed4 gray = tex2D(sampler, IN.UV); gray.rgb = tex2D(sampler, IN.UV + float2(0.0001, 0.0001)).rgb * 0.5 + 0.5; return gray; } and, then compile this shader into your app before starting the app. Now you can use this average as a texture source to set a simple Gaussian blur as shown in the example below. The example uses a pixel shader to filter out the noise (imageGaussian). You can use a similar approach if you want to do some other filtering, it's just a matter of finding a shader that's tuned for this type of filter (for example
