A two-axis support system with parallel motion is described for use in automatic computed tomography (CT) scanning of the human body. It is based on a conventional linear stage with an inertial navigation subsystem and a control law which moves the stage at a constant velocity while compensating for undesirable center of gravity movements. The combination of this subsystem with a vacuum leveling system permits automatic CT scanning of the full human body. The performance of the system is demonstrated by imaging a phantom. information to be made.
