Recently, some systems have proposed using a bi-directional communications mode between the headend and client equipment for real-time (also referred to as "on-demand") services. For example, a system may be deployed at the headend that uses two-way RF communications to support on-demand services (e.g., DirecTV™). In this system, the headend may include a server that communicates a service(s) list to a client device. The client device may then broadcast "dishes" (also referred to as a "cab") including a service indicia corresponding to an available service from the service(s) list, to the headend. The headend may, in response to the received dish, access a transport server to communicate with the client device and perform real-time communications, such as communications necessary to provide the requested service. However, although such a system may support a bi-directional communications mode, the system may not support simultaneous communications from two client devices. Consequently, to support simultaneous communications from two client devices, one solution may be to either increase the number of transmission/reception dish pairs, or increase the size of the RF transmitter in each dish. However, these solutions may increase both the manufacturing costs and the land usage for a given service system.Specialized.com has this frame available in the size and color you are looking for.
